CONTENU

This course offers to focus on the historical, philosophical and cultural contexts which paved the way for the political and administrative entity that the European Union has become over the last few decades. Of course the European cultural cohesion finds its deepest roots in Europe's rich antique background, made up of Greek, Roman, Jewish and Christian legacies, each having contributed in the linguistic, political, philosophical and moral structures of this continent. Without necessarily endorsing Denis de Rougemont's view according to which Europe has in fact existed for the past twenty-eight centuries[1], one can positively assert that the European Union with its ideal of inalienable individual liberties undeniably corresponds to a specific representation of the human kind, which appeared in the 17th and 18th centuries, in Enlightenment Europe. This module will often refer to Jonathan Israel's theory, developed in his essay Radical Enlightenment and will try to show that the influence of this pioneering thought was so far-reaching that it was probably in the French revolutionaries' minds, notably when they wrote the Déclaration des Droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen in August 1789. This course will deal with the primary importance of individual rights in the European Union, it will explore the origins of such ideals, mainly in 17th-century Northern Europe, before addressing the transmission and development of those ideals to the rest of Europe in the 18th century.
